

Hampshire Constabulary has made progress in how it tackles anti-social behaviour, but is not always able to identify repeat and vulnerable ASB victims as soon as they contact the police.

In Spring 2010, Her Majesty's Inspectorate of Constabulary (HMIC) carried out a review to find out how the police can best tackle anti-social behaviour (ASB). The national findings were published alongside individual reports that outlined how successfully each force was dealing with the problem.

The results of a follow-up inspection published today found that Hampshire Constabulary has made progress since 2010 in the way it understands and tackles ASB problems. The force has delivered additional training for safer neighbourhood teams to help them tackle ASB. It has invested in mobile data technology, providing all neighbourhood officers with hand-held devices to increase the amount of time they are out in the community rather than filling in forms in the station.

The force is also able to automatically identify some repeat ASB victims, and is developing a new computerised search facility to make this easier to do. However, it is still unable to consistently recognise if someone is vulnerable or has been subject to ASB before at the point when they first contact the police. This means some of victims may not be getting the extra support they need.

HM Inspector of Constabulary for the Eastern Region, Zoe Billingham, said:

“Anti-social behaviour is a blight that can wreck lives and communities. Our review shows that Hampshire Constabulary has made progress in how it tackles the problem, and victim satisfaction is in line with the average for England and Wales. The force should be commended for this – especially as it comes against the backdrop of significant budget cuts across the Service.”

“However, while the progress the force has made so far represents another step towards delivering a much better service to victims, there is no room for complacency. In particular, Hampshire Constabulary should make sure that repeat and vulnerable callers are identified as soon as they contact the police. This will help ensure those victims who are most at risk of harm from ASB get the extra support that they need.”
